unc-2.o He explore_greatness I think that's a good question you have there. I am pretty sure that you are not alone in thinking that not everyone has things they are expert in. As freck_less said "You don't have to be perfect. You don't have to be great at anything, really." Most people aren't great at anything, they are just low key and not as popular as the famous people. I think that you just be yourself and do your own thing. You are the best version of yourself that's good enough. And the so-called perfect people like David Walliams that you are preferring to explore_greatness, most of the famous people are lucky to be famous and I think that he is one of them . Yes some of them have worked hard but not most of them. Again if you just are the best version of yourself that's good enough.

what is greatness

I think that greatness is not the same for the most people, people aren't built to work the same way, think the same way

For some it can be as simple as getting a A in math or for some it can be a higher goal like they have to be the best in the world in a sport and the thing is that they can fill the seim wei if they meid it. Personally I think that if I am getting into a big club or top fifty in the world in the sports I do, if not I have to get a good job with a lot of money and a happy family. If I get one of these I have meid it in life. So people can have different thoughts of dreams or greatness.

I have a dream, I have a goal and that's my accomplishments in life

My dream, my goal and my accomplishments in life is to be top fifty in my sports, but not everyone knows my sport, my sport is called handball. For me I think handball is a very cool sport to be a pro in but not many people have heard or know the sport so they don't think it's that cool. And I understand that they don't think it's so cool that I think because we don't process the same way we think differently about things like handball in my perspective. So that's why we don't do the same thing because we like different things. Like I don't think that a A in matt is so cool but i know some people who do that and we have to respect that.

People are not the same, people are built different

People are grown up in different environments that can make different goals in life. I grew up in a sporty family so that makes me the person I am today. I am a very athletic boy who trains a lot at least 8 hours a week, mostly handball but some football and some strength as well. There I think is where my goal is from, the people you are around inspire you and for me that's my family and my family's interest in handball.

So what I mean by this is that the people around you will affect you for my it's my family but it can't be your friend as vell. Your friend and family affects you and guards you towards your goal from a young age so you maybe become good at something at a young age and you get hooked on it. That is where people find out what their greatness is. Okei thinks of Messi. He was a boy who grew up in a family who had love for the sport football so of cors Messi had to try it out from a young age and it just seed click for Messi. He was now in love with the sport and even skip school for becoming the greatest at least one of the greatest in the sport and following his greatness in the sport.

Why don't we have the same greatness or goal in life?

As I said earlier we think about stuff differently. I remember hearing a text go something like this, the F students are inventors and think best but outside the book's but the A students just are good at procession and remembering stuff, but 60 % of the richest people in the world are F students. So for my those who had a goal to be A student it is strange but I also think that it has something to do with the environment you grow up in. So your parents have something to do with it if you are free and can do stuff yourself and feel and learn from it, I think that is the best way to learn and become the best version of yourself.

Respect others

So I understand that people can have different greatness but for me greatness mins sports and competing out in the world. But I think we all have to respect what people want to dream about. So respect others' choices.

In English class today we watched an episode of a podcast named The Inspired Greatness. Speaking for myself I agree with what Evan Mawarire said. Even had an education in church, he was a pastor. One day when he was going to buy some food in Zimbabwe, he was standing in the line to pick up some food for the family. As minutes passed by, the price of the food increased. That was the factor that made Even sure, he wanted to speak to the people about how they can change the country. He started to post small videos of how bad things actually were in Zimbabwe. All this led to a protest, this protest could have changed Even's life, if you spoke out about the regime in Zimbabwe there was a good chance you would be in prison but he got lucky. Personally I like Even's definition of courage "The decision to act for the thing you care about the most."

freck_less you are so right there is nobody that is perfect. Everybody has scars we don't see. That's as it may not look like it. Nobody has the same quality and that is what makes us people unique. explore_greatness I am sorry to disagree with you but the people you mean are "good at anything" have worked their butts off for most of their life and they can feel useless too. For example I have good grades in school, play football and handball in the top league however I have days or even weeks where I don't feel good at anything. There are these times that make you stronger as an individual. Dadbodftw and_McTofu when you are saying growing up in the old days was easier, I have a question for you, Who has made the community we live in today? Who makes all the expectations?

The truth behind the real people.

Why do some people think that greatness means having the same opinions?

Have you ever not let others become a part of the friend groups because you feel like you have to, or else you get judged? If yes, you are not alone. In this society it has become normal to act because of the fear of being judged or made fun of. While some think that "greatness" means being the most powerful or richest, I believe "greatness" is measured in social competence. "Well-being is a condition of satisfaction" (Sagdhal, Slåttholm 2024) I think greatness means doing your best, showing courage and being able to be yourself. Then you have succeeded.

In my opinion the most important thing you could do to feel great in a society or group is being able to feel that you could be yourself without being afraid of being judged. It doesn't mean you have to feel confident all the time because everybody has some wounds the society does not see and that is completely fine. I know it sounds idiotic me sitting here saying "you try to be yourself" I get it but if we want to have a strong society, we have to venture. You need to be open to other people, a good rule for this is one we have in Norway, we call it "gyldene regelen" in English you can say "The golden rule." It goes like this, do towards others what you want others to do towards you.

Another point of view is how fantastic it is to have a multicultural society. It means you get to learn about the other cultures and see another perspective of life. An example of this is the UK. The UK is a big multicultural society because between the 1600s and 1900s the UK was one of the largest empires. If you are a country or society that involves everybody no matter what background they have, you get a good rumour. We know that black people in the USA had been through so much to be where they are today, for example the history of Rosa Parks, the woman who got arrested because she refused to give up her seat to a white man. (Parks mfl, 1999, s 201) I can promise you will find a culture that fascinates you. Do your best to include everybody, don't judge a book by its cover.

On the other hand, having a big multicultural society can create conflicts in a group. Which will lead to the problem we had in the start, holding people out of the group because you are afraid of being judged. These conflicts can be prevented with cooperation. I like that, because I personally think that to make a group, society or country great we need to be able to cooperate with each other, and not at least be open to other people's backgrounds, cultures, and viewpoints furthermore it will be difficult

The truth of why people have the exact same opinions to you may be because they look up to you, or they feel like they have to fit in. There are three main points to make a group, society or country great. You need to be able to cooperate, be open towards others, and be yourself. One thing I have learned is that people are gonna judge you no matter what you do. They are always gonna be there and be ready to attack you when you take a small miss step or when you least know it. One proverb I always have in the back of the head and I think you should take with you is, nothing ventured, nothing gained.

Hello fellow students, in class we watched an episode of "Inspire Greatness". For those who have not watched this yet, I will write a short summary here.

Evan Mawarire was a regular pastor in Zimbabwe; he was also a father and husband. His road to becoming a human rights activist was accidental. It all began at his local bakery. At this point Zimbabwe's inflation was running by 236 million %. When he joined the line his 1 trillion bill was enough for 2 loaves of bread. After two hours it was only enough for half a loaf. After a while he couldn't even feed his family, this encouraged Evan to begin to protest. On the other hand, he could risk imprisonment or worse for speaking up against the corrupt regime. However, he kept going and began speaking to others about the corrupt regime and even posting un-scripted rants online. This only shows his passion and courage for his family and nation. Mr. Mawarire says "Courage is the decision to act on the things you care about the most".

I agree with freck_less the actors such as Emma Watson have their struggles too. They are ordinary people. However, I personally think that as a role model hiding your flaws and weaknesses can be misleading. With social media it's no surprise that comparing yourself with others is common. In addition to that, it's easy to hide flaws. Therefore, I can see Explore_greatness perspective that these celebrities are "perfect". This suggests that social media can be misleading. In my opinion, I think celebrities should show courage and lead by example to the younger generation. Other generations such as dadbodftw's didn't grow up with platforms such as Instagram. Therefore, I can understand parents' difficulties with acknowledging their children's demands or perspectives. In conclusion, comparing and following celebrities can be beneficial to a degree. However, we must also look at the challenges they might be facing. Therefore, I think we should cheer for the celebrities for showing courage, greatness and inspiring the young.

Defining greatness and inspiration

In today's world, we often talk about greatness and accomplishments. Some more than others. However, why does it feel like some accomplishments are more appreciated than others? Is it based on difficulty or status? For example, take Marie Curie and her discovery about radioactivity. Yes, it might be famous and appreciated. However, how does it compare to Cristiano Ronaldo and his record goal tally in football? I would take an educated guess and say that the majority of people know more about Ronaldo than Mrs. Curie. In this text I want to debate about why some accomplishments might rank higher than others, what we define greatness as and how greatness can inspire others.

Firstly, what is greatness?

Some might argue that greatness is what we accomplish and how respected we are. However, I personally believe that greatness is not what we accomplish, but how significant of an impact it has on you, others and your goals. Greatness is not always the big accomplishments, but also the small accomplishments. For example, I believe that achieving a goal that you struggled with can be classified as greatness. Because it's not about the achievement itself, but what it means for you. Passing an exam you had no hope for when you began studying or returning to sports after a long and devastating injury. These are prime examples of greatness. Therefore, in my opinion, greatness isn't defined by the size of an achievement, but what it means for you and others.

Secondly, why do some achievements get more or less praise than others? It's easy to understand what achievements are more essential than others. In my opinion, the discovery of medication is more important than being fast, good at sports or inspiring. The discovery of medication and vaccines has had a far more impact on lives and hospitals than the record for most goals in football. Therefore, we should praise those who discover medication more than football players right? Well, it's not as simple as you think. On the other hand athletes such as Usain Bolt or Ronaldo have had more inspirational achievements. In my opinion, rising from poverty to the biggest stage and conquering is more inspirational than discovering medicine. Yes, discovering medicine is great and should be acknowledged as "greatness". However, especially for young people, seeing someone from the same situation as you rise and dominate is hope. It grants you the motivation that everything is possible despite your situation. This brings me to my last point

Lastly, the definition of greatness varies. It's important to respect others' opinions just as they respect yours. Therefore, the reason some achievement might get more praise than others is because of what the majority define as greats. Some might argue that Shakespear is a bigger great than Marie Curie because they like playwright and literature. However, it's also essential to not underestimate someone's accomplishments just because it doesn't interest you. On the other hand, you could argue that having a significant impact on a larger group of people makes you a bigger great. Therefore, if you have a large impact on the football community like Ronaldo, more people might rank you higher than a smaller community such as the hockey community. This shows that some accomplishments might rank higher because you inspire more people, not necessarily that you have had a smaller impact.

To summarise, greatness is not defined or scaled based on what you do. Instead it's defined how and who you inspire. However, we shouldn't downplay other achievements just because it's not popular or not what we think is essential. Overall, all accomplishments should be celebrated, even the smaller ones. Because we never know when we will get a chance to accomplish something great again. Therefore, small actions such as helping others, showing support and spending time together, can help us accomplish "greatness". What do you define as greatness and who is your great?
